“ I have many memories of visiting my Grandma in Vallejo or her coming down to Southern California to visit us. In our trips to Vallejo, I would stay in her shared bedroom with Auntie Carol. That’s where I remember her fondness of American TV classics like The Little House on the Prairie, Bonanza, I Love Lucy, and Family Matters. This progressed in the later years where I would sit next to her watching a random movie or soap opera on The Filipino Channel. Even in silence, this was enough for both of us as we just watched the TV and smiled at one another.

In her trips to Southern California to visit us, she would stay in my bedroom where I had the nice queen-sized bed. We didn’t have central AC at my house, but I remember her fanning me in the room as I would try to sleep during the warm summers. It was the little things like that and insisting that we get another plate of food that add to the many qualities of her being a Grandma.

Eventually as my Grandma got older and less mobile, she didn’t make the trip down to Southern California as much. However, she did make it down for one important milestone... our wedding in January. I will cherish that memory with me as well.

This has been both a wonderful and crazy year, but I know my Grandma lived a long and fruitful life. She lived a blessed life and was surrounded by loved ones all the way up to her peaceful end. I know she’s up there with my Grandpa and my Dad catching up on all the stories and missed hugs. May she rest in peace. I love you, Grandma!

Love Always, Michelle Santos

“ Every time Elena and I would visit my grandma (lola) even though we rarely communicated she would always rub Elena's belly. Being a filipino grandma you know what i am talking about they always ask you if you ate. i honestly thought she was asking elena if she ate, boy was i wayoff. I should of known better. The first thing filipino grandparents asks when are you going to get married and the second is when are you going to have kids.

I remember when elena got pregnant we were living in Hayward at the time and the 1st person that i wanted to tell that Elena was pregnant was not my brother, not my parents sorry mom and dad but it was my grandma. One night elena and i visited her as i wanted to surprise her. We went to her room and i rubbed elenas belly and said buntis. I honestly can never forget the way her face lit up. She had a smile from ear to ear and then rubbed elena's belly. I am glad she was able to meet Justin and Justin was able to meet this incredible human being. I have a video of you two spending time with one another that i will cherish as long as live.

Life is full of trials and tribulations but we have to look as the glass half full: she was here on this earth for 95 years so we should consider this as a celebration of her life. She affected many of us in somehow and someway thats why you are currently here or posting a memory of her. Even though she is not here with us now, i trust in god on the outcome. Jesus was calling to have her come home. God was more madly in love with her. Its our loss but Gods gain. Rest in peace lola. We love you. Mahal kita.
